POETRY.

Its words
Are few, but deep and solemn, and they break Fresh from the fount of feeling.—Perceval

TO

Oh, strike again thy sweet guitar!
'Tis evening's pensive hour,
And glistens bright each distant star,
As it to turn thy power.
And then upon each trembling strain I'll hang in rapture's spell;
And deem no more that hopes are vain, Amid thy music's swell.

Oh, sing to me that melting song Of purest poesy,
Whose mild notes pour my soul along With thrilling melody.
And then my thoughts uncurb'd shall fly Afar from evil earth,
With not a boding care or sigh To mar my hallowed mirth.

The beam of song steals o'er my soul Like dew along the flower!
'Tis sweeter far, than nectar'd bowl, Or all the pride of power.
It quickens memory's pleasing dream, Youth's aspirations high,
And makes the future brightly beam, With hues like sunset sky.

Then sing, 'twill chase mad passion's flush, 'Twill lull my troubled breast,
And tears, unbidden, forth shall gush Thy triumph to attest.
Then hope a 'flattering tale' shall tell Of thrilling ecstasy,
That mine's the blessed lot to dwell Immortally with thee. C. M.

THE TEMPERANCE SHIP IN A GALE.

Blow on! blow on! we shout defiance To opposition's howling blast!
On God's right arm is our reliance, He will defend us to the last,
The routed legions fly before us;
We've raised the temperance banner high,
It there shall float triumphant o'er us, Then, Freeman, rise! the vict'ry's nigh.

Roll on! roll on! who fears the motion Of waves that bear us on our way?
Our temperance bark could ride an ocean Of puny ripples such as they.
What though around, the lightning's flashing And thunder's distant growl we hear; Right onward, see, our bark is dashing,
And we, no waves, nor lightning fear.

Flash on! flash on! your harmless gleaming But shows the night you fain would hide;
The temperance flag still proudly streaming, Behold our bark unblasted ride.
The waves, with thunder's roar combining, May rage and grumble at their will;
T' Omnipotence, our cause resigning, We wait a speedy "Peace—be still!"

CHOICE READING.

"If you enlighten the people, do not forget that this is but half the work. Let them be made virtuous and religious, or you leave them more exposed to danger than they were before."

From the Richmond Republican.

A FRAGMENT.

BY "ÆSCHYLUS."

[Concluded.]

My guitar had fallen from my hand, and its wail, at having fallen, was the shriek which I had heard. But a something spoke to my spirit, that my dream was true, and like an incubus it hung upon me, so that, when the afternoon came again, I walked with the most intense curiosity by the father's home; and lo! I beheld two small coffins borne in the arms of friends, and deposited in the ready hearse. And my vision was not false; only the reality had exceeded it; for both the little prattlers had been plucked, like blossoms from the tree of life, and now were going to their cold and gloomy graves. Behind them came the pale and heart-stricken parent—his countenance reflecting his heart—for it was almost broken; and grief had cast its gloomy veil over joy's effulgent light—so that its beams no longer shone from his once happy visage. But the mother—where was she? Alas! the fell disease, at one fierce swoop, had struck low in death the two lovely babes, and laid upon a dying bed the beautiful mother. The little ones were borne before the mourning friends to the dark and gloomy caverns of death; and as the clouds fell on the coffin lids, their hollow sound found a strange echo in the father's breast, which too truly told that a few more days, and his darling wife would be borne to the tomb, already gaping with horrid yawn to receive its victim. The echo in the father's breast, spoke too truly, for after a day and night of hopeless watching, when the soul was sick with the consciousness that all efforts would be in vain —when the breast was pregnant with a suppressed sigh, struggling for birth—when the eye was swelling with an unbidden tear, that would, despite all efforts, bubble up from its deep-moved fount—the father felt that unrelenting death was about to snare the chords of his heart, already so rudely wrung by the loss of his darling cherubs, and make him bankrupt in affection, by opening the horrid chancel house to receive its tenants of clay, when the freed spirit should leave to rotteness and corruption the beautiful fabric.

My spirit was again upon the wing: and like a carrier dove, it flew to its point of destination—the chamber of death. The father was leaning upon the bed; his head was bowed upon his hands. Upon the bed, with a cheek whiter than the pillow on which she lay, the inanimate form of the mother rested. Her eye was closed—her breast heaved not—still, still, and cold, like a withering lily, with her hands crossed above her pulseless breast; the brow was smooth, as though thought, with its brain-wrought wrinkles, had fled. There was no voice or murmur of complaint, but all was still, hushed, as if death had become sole tenant of the chamber. My spirit had forgotten its sorrows, and gazed in anxious suspense upon the father's form.
Slowly he raised his head, to look upon the dead body of his dear, loved wife—revealing a countenance whence nought but animate pain, in all its living palor, gave evidence of existence. There was a wild, hopeless gleam in his bloodshot eye, and the furrows of anguish and thought were traced in his hollow cheek. The eye was tearless, but like the unfountain deserted, 'twas a hot and burning, speaking of the blasted heart, over which, in all its terrible power, the withering simoom of grief had breathed its desolation—changing the verdure of life to the parched and shrubless sands of sorrow. There was no joy in that once happy heart; grief and anguish had done their work, and in that altered countenance, in eloquent silence, spoke the untold agony of despair.

A mist spread around my spirit; and the father's countenance, the dead mother, the chamber, all was shut from my sight. I was conscious of a hollow voice, which rung in my ears these words:
"Mortal! be wise! Earth hath no heart untinged by care and sorrow! and bitterness is the lot of man. Henceforth, envy not thy fellow man! Be wise! Farewell!" It was gone.

I awoke! My vision was true. The mother was carried to her grave, and at the tomb I saw that the mourner's uncovered head was changing from a jetty black to grey—the grey of sorrow.

My heart treasured the spirit's lesson, and I ceased to envy—nursing my own sorrow, believing the time will shortly come when life and sorrow both shall pass away.
